The need for internationally and interculturally competent teachers is rising due to the increasing globalisation of society resulting in increased linguistic and cultural diversity in today's classrooms. As a European mobility and education programme, Erasmus has become a cornerstone of the internationalisation of European higher education institutions over the last three decades.

The 16th volume of the study series of the University of Teacher Education Styria aims to disseminate results and products of international cooperation to ensure their sustainability. Authors focus on project results, international experiences and best practices as well as benefits and challenges of international networking, cooperation projects and research activities.

Susanne Linhofer is head of the Institute for Diversity Studies and International Relations at the University College of Teacher Education Styria (PHSt).

Heiko Haas-Vogl is deputy head of the Institute for Diversity Studies and International Relations and coordinates International Relations as well as the Erasmus Outgoings programme at the University College of Teacher Education Styria (PHSt).

Oliver Holz is professor at the Faculty of Economics and Business at KU Leuven. He is member of the research group 'Leuven Economics of Education Research (LEER)'.
